Kremlin denies U.S. claims that Russia is stalling in Ukraine peace talks

The Kremlin rejected accusations from Trump's envoy that Russia is delaying Ukraine peace talks, insisting it wants a diplomatic solution and has met all agreements so far. However, talks remain stalled, with no date set for the next round. This highlights the gap between Russia's public statements and U.S. concerns that Moscow uses negotiations to buy time while continuing military operations, leaving prospects for swift progress uncertain.

Iran-linked hackers threaten to release Trump aides' emails

Iran-linked hackers threatening to release more emails from Trump's circle highlight how cyber tactics are being used amid U.S.-Iran tensions. Though earlier leaks didn't change the 2024 election, new disclosures could embarrass Trump allies or reveal sensitive details. The hackers' return after recent U.S.-Iran clashes suggests cyber operations may serve as a lower-risk tool of retaliation, keeping geopolitical tensions simmering without sparking direct conflict.

Thai Prime Minister Paetongtarn's fate in limbo

Paetongtarn Shinawatra's suspension highlights Thailand's ongoing power struggle between elected leaders tied to the Shinawatra family and conservative institutions like the military and judiciary. Her controversial call with Hun Sen has weakened her coalition and public support, raising doubts about her political future. If the court removes her, Thailand could face renewed political instability and possible shifts in leadership or elections.
