👉 Oil prices pause slide on US-Japan trade deal

Oil prices have slightly rebounded after three days of decline, driven by optimism over the U.S.-Japan trade deal. However, this boost is limited by concerns over the upcoming EU-China summit and ongoing trade tensions. While U.S. stock figures offer some relief, market sentiment remains cautious, and the potential for U.S. sanctions on Russian oil could tighten supply further. Short-term price gains appear limited, with geopolitical risks and trade uncertainties likely to keep the market volatile.

👉 Trump says Fed's Powell will be out in 8 months, calls him a 'numbskull'

President Trump's criticism of Federal Reserve Chairman Jerome Powell, calling him a "numbskull" for keeping interest rates high, highlights increasing tensions between the White House and the Fed. Trump's push for lower rates risks undermining the Fed's independence, with economists warning that political pressure could lead to higher inflation and rates in the long term. As the administration continues its campaign, it may create market uncertainty and destabilize financial conditions, complicating the Fed's ability to maintain credibility and effective policy.

👉 Israel will strike Iran again if threatened, defence minister says

Israeli Defence Minister Israel Katz's statement emphasizes Israel's readiness to strike Iran again if threatened, reflecting the fragile nature of the ceasefire established after a 12-day air war in June. Israel's strikes on Iranian nuclear sites, backed by U.S. support, raised fears of a wider regional conflict. Moving forward, the situation remains tense, with the possibility of escalating hostilities leading to a broader conflict, affecting regional stability and global diplomacy.
