One month into Iran war, only hard choices for Trump

Donald Trump faces a narrowing set of choices after a month of war with Iran: pursue a weak diplomatic exit or escalate and risk a long, politically costly conflict. Iran has kept pressure on Gulf energy shipments and continued regional attacks, driving a major oil shock and deepening market anxiety. Trump is signaling both restraint and escalation, while his peace proposal shows little chance of success. At home, the war is unpopular, fuel prices are rising, and his approval rating has fallen. Analysts say the core problem is the absence of a clear, achievable endgame for the war right now.

Twenty-two migrants die off Greek coast after six days at sea

Twenty-two migrants died off Greece's coast after drifting for six days in a dinghy that had left Tobruk, Libya, bound for Europe. Twenty-six survivors, including a woman and child, were rescued near Crete, with poor weather and lack of food and water blamed for the deaths. Greek authorities arrested two South Sudanese men on suspicion of people trafficking, illegal entry, and negligent homicide. Greece remains a major entry point for undocumented migrants crossing the Mediterranean, a route made especially dangerous by overcrowded boats, bad weather, and limited supplies. UNHCR says over 4,000 people have already arrived in Greece by sea this year.

How Trump and the oil markets move in sync: a tango in five charts

Trump's comments on the Iran war are still affecting oil markets, but less than before as traders grow more doubtful of his signals. Since the strikes began on 28 February, oil has risen sharply from about $72 to nearly $112 a barrel, peaking at $118 last week. Analysts say markets react because oil reflects broader geopolitical and economic risk, but Trump's mixed rhetoric makes it harder to judge policy direction. Some believe his statements are aimed as much at influencing prices as signaling strategy. Investors remain anxious because his reassurances are not matched by signs of de-escalation from Iran.
